

Artist statement

The use of children's toys eerily wrapped in bandages as subject matter and iconic reductive technique of scraping away at a black latex surface line by line gives rise to meticulously rendered, seemingly three-dimensional forms. The resulting figures, set against a stark black expanse as background, are simultaneously haunting, imposing and imbued with an intense sense of loneliness. They mirror the isolation and confusion that are the increasingly common by-products of our ever more connected yet somehow ever more fragmented societies. As cultures clash, ideologies metastasize, and socio-political conflicts and inequalities intensify, Zafar's figures, while culled from the collective memories of our childhoods, embody the sense of desperation, helplessness and darkness that can result from our increasingly complex and volatile global situation. These drifting creatures seem to have been created to either perpetually ponder the purpose of their existence in a world they cannot clearly see or understand, or be cursed with the sight and knowledge of the true void in which they exist. Soon after concluding his studies Zafar spent time working as an illustrator, an experience that greatly influenced his practice. The form of his signature work has since evolved to a haunting depiction of monochromatic images and his fascination with black and white pushes his medium and practice towards newer directions and exploration with broader connotations. Zafar always interested in history relates to the modern time and re-contextualizes timeline, connoting the credence, countries, conquests and casualties that have occurred to shape social, cultural, religious and political identities, as they stand today.

Profile

Adeel uz Zafar is an artist, illustrator and art educator. Zafar holds a Bachelor of Fine Arts from National College of Arts, Lahore (1998). 'Size Does Matter' at V.M. Art Gallery, Karachi was a turning point for him and his practice. This show, which was held in 2009, catapulted him into the league of emerging artists of Pakistan. Zafar's works have been featured in several national and international exhibitions including 11 solo shows and numerous group shows. He has presented his work at Biennales and international art fairs and festivals such as Art Stage Singapore, Art Fair Philippines, Art Dubai, Art Abu Dhabi, Art Basel Hong Kong, Pulse Art Fair New York and India Art Fair. Zafar also featured in publications such as Art Review, ArtAsiaPacific, The Express Tribune (Pakistan), Dawn (Pakistan) and many more. He has participated in both national and international residencies and Zafar has also curated several projects as an artist as a curator in Pakistan. Currently, he is represented by FOST Gallery, Singapore & AAN Gandhara-art Space, Karachi-Hong Kong. Zafar serves as a faculty member of the Indus Valley School of Art and Architecture, Karachi. Zafar is also acting as a nominator from Pakistan for the Sovereign Art Prize. One of his nominees Ahmed Javed was awarded SAAP in 2019.

Cover Note By Scheherezade Junejo

In popular culture discourse, the "overrated vs. underrated" debate is a pervasive and subjective framework used to critique, re-evaluate, and assert taste regarding cultural products like movies, music, celebrities, and of course, art. This dynamic reflects how people interact with and interpret mass culture in the digital age. This debate is the central theme of Adeel-uz-Zafar's latest solo presentation.

Zafar's practice, which revolves around engravings and etchings of plush toys, has always been popular amongst audiences and collectors. It has also been somewhat polarising in that it has inspired dialogues about whether his work - which has largely followed one subject – is overrated or underrated. Zafar brings this discourse to the forefront in this new series of works, creating a meta-discussion around popularity and perception.

Qs: Why did you choose this theme of overrated vs. underrated?

AUZ: Given the current socio-political climate of the world, there are many topics under discussion which are over-valued, in my opinion. Similarly, gallery culture, art fairs and private collections have now become overly saturated with popular practices. Conversely, I have experienced audiences feeling the same about my practice as well, with some deeming it overrated or underrated because of the repetitive quality of my imagery. After years of practice, I have come to view the transactional nature of art-making for audiences as being overrated itself. This paradox of two words – overrated vs. underrated - is what I have chosen to play with in this series.

Qs: Is this discourse a reflection of the audience and its values, and not the art itself?

AUZ: Yes, and it moves the conversation away from meaningful artistic analysis towards trends and fashions of the time. For me, it is not about the opinion or values of the audience that partake in this dialogue. Instead, through this work, I am simply speaking to what – according to me – is overrated or underrated in my own imagery and practice. I feel artists and galleries all over the world need this dialogue for criticality.

Qs: As an artist, how do you separate your work from the demands of the audience and consumers of your practice?

AUZ: We need to extricate ourselves from the whims of the audience to create critical conversations about art. Else, our individuality will be squashed under the weight of trends and fashionable concerns. Trends do not last, and when we deem a subject more popular than something else, we end up reducing the importance of other, more critical dialogues, which end up becoming underrated. There needs to be room for every subject to be addressed without placing topics on a pedestal of importance based on fashionable concerns.

Qs: Teddy and Bunny have been the two staples of your practice, carrying a very high demand. How have you unpacked their rating according to the theme of this show?

AUZ: I started this series using Teddy and Bunny to symbolise what - in my opinion-encapsulates the discourse of overrated vs. underrated in relation to my practice. I attributed colour to denote my rating, giving a subtle red undertone to the Teddy series, which is overrated for me now, even though statistically it has a very high demand amongst collectors. To symbolise the idea of being overrated, I have treated each piece with a highly finished and visible stroke, with each drawing being clearly definable to show that there is little to no room for growth here. Adversely, Bunny – even though it is highly in demand – seems underrated to me, which is why I have given it a blue undertone. Additionally, the Bunny series, which is complete in my view, has been treated with an unfinished essence, using lighter strokes and fade-out effects because I feel it creates a sense of unrealised potential, making it an underrated image. The more finished something is (like the Teddy series), the less it's potential is, making it overrated. But works in process (like the Bunny series), which are still complete to my eye, have more room for growth, development and imagination, making them underrated images. So, it is through the finished/unfinished quality of the works and the use of soft undertones that I am creating a dialogue based subjectively on my own views of my practice as an artist, and this applies to other works in the show as well. Beyond Teddy and Bunny, I have used fading and scratching techniques to denote a hidden, unfinished and obscure quality in my other images, showing an as-yet unrealised potential which makes them underrated.

Qs: Moving beyond the highly popular subjects of your practice, you have incorporated some new concepts and subjects as well. How did that come about and how does it relate to your view of overrated vs. underrated?

AUZ: Just as our core values and beliefs change, evolve and grow from one generation to the next based on the concerns, updates, technologies and changing values of the time, previous beliefs become overrated over the passage of time. Time gives any subject its attached value. Over time, we become physically limited, and an entropy of our own existence comes into play, making our values, opinions and beliefs peak and decline according to our vitality. We go from underrated to overrated over the span of our lives, as a new generation creates new values which take centre-stage. In order to deal with this entropy, we must adapt to stay relevant and create space for new, more underrated dialogues. To address this, I had to branch out beyond my signature subjects and confront the new trends in popular culture today. I incorporated the infamously divisive Labubu doll, animated hand gestures and distorted surface sizes to bring the conversation closer to the discourse happening today. I have also added a new subject with studies of Octopus toys, where I have played with the underrating of smaller sizes for effect. The Labubu doll, which has already peaked in its popularity, has been treated with subtly demonic overtures and similar red tinges to denote its overrated-ness. The one-eyed creature diptychs on distended surfaces are also a new addition to the series. Treated as compositional mutations, this new take might not be understood now, but will come to be appreciated later, making it underrated in my view. Experiments are generally a grey area when it comes to defining their rating. The audience input will make things clearer about which category they fall in.

Qs: The lightboxes are arguably your most diverse pieces in this series. What do they represent?

AUZ: The lightboxes with animated hand gestures are universal symbols that even a child can identify. Appropriated from open sources, they add a lighter, quirkier element to the show, and identify immediately as a symbol of popular culture. Moreover, these hand gestures have become a language itself, used especially by younger generations today. Whole conversations can be had digitally using just emojis and stickers, to depict heavy, complex emotions and reactions, as simply as possible. This indicates how overrated language itself has become globally, especially for the coming generations who express themselves more through pictures and symbols. It also speaks to the fast pace of how trends rise and fall, devoid of any real depth. Furthermore, these gestures can be politicised or weaponised, creating an opinion of approval or disapproval akin to the frivolousness and carelessness with which the world is being run today. The red line used in the display of the lightboxes is lit to represent this constant polarity of opinion.

Qs: There are also images in this series which have no definable detail, they are ambiguous shapes with hints of colour to define their rating. What does this departure from your signature style mean for you?

AUZ: This is a side of my work that nobody sees. For me, even these images are clearly visible and defined, but it will not read that way to the viewer because they need to have the drawing explicitly laid out for them to understand and appreciate. However, this act of over-explaining or over-defining an image, in my view, makes it overrated. The more open to interpretation it is, the more underrated its value. This is why I have played with making the image barely visible beyond its shape. It reflects the vast area of unexplored ideas I have in my mind, which are deeply underrated and require a platform to exist and be appreciated. I can play around with a single toy as a subject and use it to create hundreds of images – endless possibilities - which are all new and equally exciting for me. This ambiguous play of visuals is an extension of my imagery and technique, which brings out an unexplored - hence underrated - aspect of my work. It may not read as exciting to the audience, but it deeply interests me.

Qs: In a world where subjectivity masquerades as objectivity, how much do the viewers and audience interplay into how your work is read?

AUZ: In my view, it's a vice versa equation. They are free to judge my work as overrated or underrated, and I am free to form my own opinion about whether they are overrated or underrated in their assumptions.

Qs: Should art-making practices be determined by what is overrated or underrated according to the trends of the time?

AUZ: Hype is used to sell an idea for profit. The discourse today revolves around fashionable (but overrated) topics. If we are busy following trends, who will innovate? Will we be fulfilled as creators in our own right? Furthermore, following current trends leads to a mass waste of natural resources. I believe our responsibility towards the planet must also be taken into account. We must be accountable for the dialogues we are creating.

Qs: You cannot deny that artists looking to break free of the mould of fashionable trends also have to account for their cost of living in today's highly economically charged world. How do you reconcile that, if you do not capitalise on what is trending?

AUZ: I believe that vision and sell-ability must go hand in hand. There must be balance where you can satisfy your own curiosity, as well as provide an economically stable platform for yourself. We are not craftsmen following overrated trends, nor are we bohemian free spirits who exist just to feel. There are realities we need to take into account in order to be creative individuals adding to the rich fabric of our society and culture. This series of works represents that balance; some of these works are for the viewers, and some of them are solely for my peace of mind.
